Independence of Advisors

The Committee shall determine whether any compensation consultants, counsel, auditors or other advisors are independent, considering the following factors:

4. any business or personal relationship between the individual consultant, counsel, auditor or other advisor and a member of the Committee;
5. whether the individual consultant, counsel, auditor or other advisor owns any stock in the Company; and
6. whether the consultant, counsel, auditor or other advisor, or the firm employing such consultant, counsel, auditor or other advisor, has any business or personal relationship with an executive officer of the Company.

The Committee shall consider the independence of any compensation consultant, counsel, auditor or other advisor in its decision to retain the advisor or when otherwise receiving advice from an advisor. Following the initial selection of or receipt of advice from a consultant, counsel, auditor or other advisor, the Committee shall evaluate such advisor's independence on an annual basis thereafter. Nothing contained in herein shall be construed to require the Committee to conduct an independence assessment of an advisor whose role is limited to (a) consulting on the Company's broad based plans that do not discriminate in favor of executive officers or directors, or (b) providing non-customized information or information customized based on parameters the Company develops, and on which the advisor does not provide advice.
